

Breathe With The Rainforest

In the southeastern corner of Peru lies a small river port that serves as a gateway to the Amazon rainforest—Puerto Maldonado. As the plane descended, a vast, unbroken expanse of green spread out beneath the window. The planet's lungs looked dense, vibrant, and very much alive, and I couldn't wait to see them up close.

The air was saturated with the scent of soil, vegetation, and river water—humid, raw, and intoxicating. I knew I was about to step into a completely different world. A world teeming with extraordinary plants and endlessly fascinating animals. During the four days I spent living alongside the rainforest, I learned how to breathe with the Earth.
