

Below us, the Tambopata River wound across the valley in a great zigzag—tranquil and grand. Everyone fell silent before the view, even our breathing seemed gentler. A lone boat slowly appeared in the distance, cutting through the still water and sending out a ring of ripples. It was the perfect finishing touch to the vast painting before us. Nature had not been disturbed—we were simply part of it.

When we returned to the riverbank, the captain switched off all the lights to avoid attracting insects. Not long after we set out, we spotted a caiman resting on the shore. I lay on the boat's wooden bench, the night breeze brushing my face, the water tapping softly against the hull. Looking up, half the sky was blocked by the roof of the boat, but the other half sparkled brilliantly. The treetops drifted slowly backward as we moved, yet the stars above remained still. At that moment, I felt like a voyager from a thousand years ago—finding direction not from the changing world below, but from the unwavering sea of stars. That star-lit sky became my anchor in a world in motion, and a memory I will never forget.
